Good News Project: masks for many

Like most of us, Yuli Charbonneau and Ana Neira, former owners of Yuli's Designs and Alterations, were fearful about how COVID-19 might hurt their family members.

They decided to make masks for family and close friends. They then went above and beyond and decided to use their resources and talent to help others as well. They weren't sure how people would react to the masks but reached out anyway.

Yuli and Ana recently closed their business and still had a lot of fabric in stock. They started making masks in early March and have made a total of 474 masks for front line workers; imagine all the fabric they would need! They used up their own fabric to make the first 232 and the rest are being made from donations of fabric and elastic.

They are making sure they don't spread germs by spraying their equipment and they explain to people that they need to wash and clean the masks. The masks are given by porch pick-up and they schedule pick-up times so people don't come at the same time. They currently have a waiting list and are waiting for a shipment of fabric and supplies to arrive. They have appreciated the donations they have received from people.

It is important to them to make masks because they want the front line people and everybody to feel less fearful.

They want people to know that they aren't doing this for recognition, they just want to help protect vulnerable people.

We can help by donating money, fabric, and elastic so they can make more masks. You can find them on Facebook Messenger at Yuli Designs.

They're doing this out of the kindness of their hearts, potentially saving lives, and reducing the spread of COVID-19.
